The dye and pigment combination offers excellent color development and ease of use but care should be taken to avoid saturating open pore woods like oak to avoid the possibility of stain weeping, or sometimes called bleeding, out of the pores. Larger panels often achieve the best results by spraying the stain on and then wiping. This reduces the risk of applying too much stain to the surface, which can saturate the substrate.

Also testing any stain and finish system on a sample panel is always recommended before starting any job. Taking the time to make a sample panel will pay dividends when it is time to do the job.
